

A week's drive in an open carriage among the mountains of Northern New Hampshire affords a pleasure not to be forgotten. Their striking outlines and singular combinations of the foundation for this; but it is greatly enhanced by the perpetual change effected in the scenery by the slightest alteration of place, by atmospheric variation, and by the progress of the hours which seem doubly winged in this enchanting region. The shadows pointing westward with admonitory finger, shortening, vanishing, and then turning eastward with a prophecy of hope, the different angles at which the rays strike the earth, now playing over this slope, now touching that crag, and now revealing upon the chasm, the shifting cloud flecks, the sparkling dew, the glittering mist, are good things ministering to the grand, strange, and beautiful. A few cattle feeding or at rest, a sentinel cork perched on the topmost bough of a dead pine, the swoop of a hawk, the daring movement of a king bird give in an instant a new aspect to the landscape. Here and there a smoke wreath sways upward, and one sees a hundred quivering tongues of flame, curling and writhing and intertwining, eating out the centre of a huge stump, devouring great piles of brushwood, or marching with burning tread through a woodland, scathing and destroying all within its reach. A little stream glides demurely beneath the alders, tumbles and foams among rocks, or takes flying leaps from projecting cliffs. Lakelets sun themselves high up among the hills, wearing a star upon every ripple. The forests are one flush of color, so rich, so clear, so exquisitely shaded, so finely harmonized, so admirably relieved by the dark firs and pines, as to defy the pencil of the artist and the pen of the poet to delineate or describe.

The imagination, thus stimulated, almost involuntarily creates, and almost as certainly busies itself with the past. In Rumney a road winds along the base of a mountain range whose precipitous sides, torn by some vast convulsion, attract the gaze of the awe-struck traveler. Thither, many years ago came a man named George Thornton. Restless and dissatisfied, he had wearied out his early friends, and upon the death of his parents, he visited the new world, hoping to find himself the hero of many a wild adventure. He was brave, agile and ingenious, with a quick eye and a ready hand. True to his characteristic traits, he soon wearied of the settlement, and, armed to the teeth, plunged into the wilderness. Overcome with fatigue he crept into a cave at the place we have mentioned, put his musket in a recess at his head, and fell asleep. A whoop, a yell, a rush, and he awoke a prisoner to a band of Indians.

The feast of Green Corn was close at hand and it was intended by his captors that his death should grace it. This he readily comprehended, and he rallied all his strength to meet the horrors of his fate. He clung to the minutes as they flew by, filling them with earnest vows and passionate supplications, or numbering each possible circumstance of suffering and terror, that nothing might find him unprepared. But love cut for him a path unknown either to strength or craft. Winona, the flower of her tribe, with eyes full of light, and cheeks whereon the rose deepened beneath the bronze, gave her heart to the young stranger and planned his escape. Never had she seemed so gay as on the evening preceding the festival. She laughed and sang, and filled the bowls of the revellers once and again, urging them with many a wile to drink of the beverage which she had drugged with some harmless provocative of slumber. Midnight found all asleep or with dulled perceptions and heavy limbs. Pressing one hand firmly upon Thornton's lips, she cut the withes that bound him, gave him moccasins and a blanket of her own embroidering, and motioned him to follow her. Freed from his ligatures with his recovered musket upon his shoulder, new life seemed to pour into his veins. He swam rivers, scaled heights, and crossed morasses, everywhere obliterating the traces of his flight. At the end of two days, Winona paused. She instructed Thornton by signs, who went through the simple marriage ceremonies known to her, and then on bended knees, promised his Maker to remain faithful to her as his wife. She called him Orono, or "heart's fullness," and he at first found in her all that he desired of happiness. At the expiration of a year, however, the old longing returned, and as he had fled society, so he with proportionate eagerness desired his sweets. He proposed to Winona to remove with her to Portsmouth, but she shook her head. "The maidens of your tribe are fair," she answered, "they will steal the thoughts of Orono." Several times he sought her consent, but always with the same result, and he grew irritable and capricious. One day, upon returning to their cavern, after an unusually long absence, he found Winona dying, and beside her a wooden cup partly filled with the berries of the nightshade. With her last effort, she threw her arms about him and expired. He frantically rubbed her stiffening limbs, kissed her icy brow, and called her by all the tender names which she had taught him. Exhaustion followed, and at this succeeded a deep and settled grief. All that she had done for him, all that she had been to him, presented itself continually to his memory and heart. He cleared a spot for her grave among some young cedars, and carved a head cross of the same wood, near which he planted a wild rose. Then he made a rude sketch of the surrounding scenery, and set out—not for Portsmouth, now linked with saddening associations—but for Boston, which he had never visited. But he did not go alone. Winona's laugh was in the murmur of the brook, her voice in the song of the birds, the rustle of her garments in the touch of the forest leaves. He was a changed man, transformed by the grand thought of a woman who had loved him and who he knew that she loved.

Twenty years afterward a pilgrim left his knapsack at the little inn of the rising town of W., and hastened to a fine grove of cedars a few miles distant. He was ill and feeble, but he remained there in spite of remonstrance and warning, and those who went the next day to seek him, found him dead on a green grave marked by a fallen cross of cedar, and a luxuriant rose which had heaped it with its soft petals.

A lazy, over-fed lad returning from his work one day was asked by his master if he had no other motion than that.

"Yes," replied the youth "but it's a little slower."
